

INDIANA'S RIGHT-TO-WORK BATTLE HEATS UP

January 9, 2012 Indiana's Right-to-Work Battle Heats Up The Indiana General Assembly is "Ground Zero" in the epic battle over the so-called "Right-to-Work" legislation. So much has been written about "Right-to-Work" that it makes some sense to understand what the Indiana proposed legislation actually says. Some Background about "Right-to-Work" Most private non-governmental employers are covered by the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, sometimes referred to as the Taft Hartley Act. Until 1947, the law allowed a union and an employer to agree that employees must join the union within 30 days or be fired. That law still allows a "Union Security Clause" to be included in collective bargaining agreements, but in 1947 a provision was added to the law that permitted states to prohibit agreements that would require union membership as a condition of employment. In other words, a state could pass a law that gave employees the "right to work" without having to become a union member. Since then, 22 states have passed Right-to-Work laws. Oklahoma was the last state to pass a Right-to-Work law in 2001. Indiana actually was a Right-to-Work state from 1957 until 1964 when it was repealed. None of the states adjoining Indiana are Right-to-Work states. What the Proposed Indiana Right-to-Work Law Provides The proposed law makes it a Class A misdemeanor to require an individual to: (1) become or remain a member of a labor organization; (2) pay dues, fees or other charges to a labor organization; or (3) pay to a charity or another third party an amount that represents dues, fees or other charges required of members of a labor organization, as a condition of employment or continuation of employment. It establishes a separate private right of action for violations or threatened violations. It does not apply to federal employees, employees subject to the Railway Labor Act, certain employees over whom the federal government has jurisdiction, state employees and employees of a political subdivision. Generally, county and municipal employees would be employees of a political subdivision of the state of Indiana. Significantly, the law applies only to agreements entered into, modified, renewed or extended after March 14, 2012. It does not apply to or abrogate agreements in effect on March 14, 2012. Nothing in the proposed law prohibits employees from choosing to voluntarily become union members and pay dues. We will continue to follow the debate in the General Assembly and keep you advised as this drama unfolds. The full text of Indiana's H.B. No. 1001 with significant provisions highlighted is below.
